A sofa always stands apart in the hierarchy of furniture design: it demands space, presence, and context. Its form and volume command attention. Its footprint demands respect. In choosing a sofa, we choose our state of mind - the mood we will inhabit as we sit, recline, or simply walk past it. That is precisely why a sofa must carry an emotional message, and its design must be driven not only by ergonomics but by emotion.

My sofa is called TLPRT - an abbreviation of the word Teleport - and it truly offers the chance to be anywhere. The use of chrome elements in the design transforms a static piece of furniture into an interactive form. Reflections dissolve its sharp contours, create new worlds, and allow us to travel without ever leaving our own home or apartment - teleporting to any place and time accessible to our imagination and dreams. The side protrusions are not merely a decorative device, but a tool for functional zoning, creating a private island of silence and calm amidst the surrounding chaos of daily life. The sofa boasts ergonomic proportions and, through its choice of materials, captivates the viewer from the very first glance.
